(7 points)

Read the text carefully then do the activities.

Island of Green Woman Power

When Sophia Kiarie moved from Kenya's forested highlands to the arid community of Ruiru 20 years ago, she was immediately struck by the lack of greenery. She looked out over the parched fields and wondered where she could possibly find enough firewood for the family, including her husband and eleven children. So she began studying informally, asking Kenyan foresters their advice and carefully observing the life cycles of different trees. 'Some died of drought,' she recalls, putting a finger into the soft Kenyan soil. 'Others died when the hard rains came.'

Though she never took a class in forestry or botany, Kiarie, 41, learned quickly. 'I have a degree in understanding the problems of my area,' she says with a smile. She became a local field officer for the Geneva-based Bellerive Foundation, a non-profit organisation that focuses on environmental issues. That woke her up to the dangers of land degradation around Ruiru, about 20 kilometres north of Nairobi. Soon she opened a tree nursery, which has so far distributed more than 500,000 seedlings to schools, hospitals and individual farmers. In addition, Kiarie has led a successful campaign to conserve trees by promoting an energy efficient, low-cost stove designed by engineers from the Bellerive Foundation. The stove, which burns far less wood than the traditional stone-bordered fire, has become a local hit; more than 2,000 Kenyan families and 600 institutions now use one. 'I can convince people because I am a beneficiary of the product,' says Kiarie. 'It's easier to convince people when they can identify with you.'

Kiarie is not just a local hero. Last November, she was invited to Miami to attend the United Nations-sponsored Global Assembly on 'Woman and the Environment' where she spoke about her crusade to establish hundreds of 'green islands' – plots of trees – around government institutions. Kiarie believes women are the key to a healthier future for Kenya and hopes to get more of them involved in her forestation projects.

'Women know how to nurse,' she says, gently pushing a tiny sprout into the earth. 'They have caring hands.'

1. On your answer sheet, copy down the indirect question mentioned in paragraph one.
